My dear Professor Dorado:

I am much indebted to you for your last book on the Social Value of Laws and Authorities. It is a striking testimony to the freedom of discussion now allowed in a kingdom and a university which have long stood for a different order of things. I note, however, your citation from Castrillo, published in 1521, which breathes the same spirit, and that also of the American Declaration of Independence of 1776.

I shall take the liberty of writing a short review of your work, in the Yale Law Journal, and will send you a copy when it is published.

Yours sincerely,
